RUSSIAN-LANGUAGE TRAINING

Foreign students can benefit from free Russian-language courses from the Faculty of Arts. The Faculty has long been known for its focus on Slavic Studies and excellence in teaching Russian to non-native speakers.

Testimony from Jan Dubecky, PhD student at the Faculty of Arts

“ The Faculty of Arts at Charles University offers a variety of study programs focused on teaching the Russian language. Concurrently, these programs emphasize understanding social, political, and spiritual developments in Eastern Europe. Students may thus select programs focusing on areas such as interpreting, teaching the Russian language in schools, or applying the language in the economic sector. The study program is further enhanced by opportunities for international mobility (within the Erasmus+ program), significantly deepening students' knowledge. Graduates are thereby fully prepared for the practical use of the language at the C1-C2 level. ”

COLLABORATION WITH STANFORD

The Stanford U.S.-Russia Forum (SURF) is a student exchange program that brings together around 25 Russian and American students to work on joint projects.

The program implies project work coached by relevant faculty and annual student-to-student conferences in 2024, 2025, and 2026

SURF program overview

<https://cddrl.fsi.stanford.edu/content/surf-program-overview>

“ In cooperation with the Boris Nemtsov Educational MA program, the SURF program will produce collaborative research by students from both countries on core issues of mutual interest to American and Russian participants.

Now more than ever there is an increased need for better mutual understanding and opportunities for person-to-person dialogue on common areas of interest. The SURF program anticipates a time when relations between the US and Russia are eventually more productive and constructive.

We seek, therefore, to build a foundation in the expectation that at some point, we will return to a time when the Russian and American governments and societies can constructively collaborate.
